

After a Professional Challenge?

Selection interviews in Bahrain. Human factors on the bridge of a warship. Mission-stress debriefings in East Timor. Disaster relief effort support in Samoa. Qualitative satisfaction research for technicians. Job analysis, assessment centres, and training development for operational divers. These are but a few of the tasks navy psychologists have been involved with in recent months. Interested? Up for it?

The Royal New Zealand Navy's organisational psychologists are based in Devonport, Auckland. You'll work within our highly skilled team, get registered (if you're not already) and practice in a broad range of I/O and defence psychology areas including research, selection, training, performance management, counselling, organisational development and change management, employee satisfaction, personal wellbeing, human factors and operations support.

This is a uniformed position that presents the excitement and challenges of being a military officer as well as a psychology practitioner. The successful applicant will complete naval officer training before commencing their registration. You'll need to be motivated, enthusiastic, and be able to think on your feet. You will have (or be about to complete) a sound master's degree in industrial/organisational psychology and be eligible for registration in NZ. Work experience in I/O psychology or a related field is a bonus, but not a requirement.

You'll also enjoy the many added benefits of being a NZ Defence Force member including superannuation, medical and dental, housing, and gym, sports, and outdoor pursuit opportunities (if that's what you're into!).

Due to the security clearance required for this position, applicants must be New Zealand citizens.

For further information and application forms, contact:

Lieutenant Commander Lynette Marchant on (09) 445 5546; or forward your CV to: lynette.marchant@nzdf.mil.nz.

Applications close 31 July 2010.
